In the South Glad It Last!

In a recent address at Gettysburg Secretary of War Dickinson said: "At this day there are in the South but few, if any, who would not turn with abhorrence from any suggestion that it would have been better for the South if it had succeeded in establishing an independent government."

This is a very bold statement, but it does not appear to us to impart verity. We have as extensive an acquaintance throughout the South as our friend Dickinson, and we believe, a better understanding of the sentiments of the surviving soldiers who fought for its independence; for which reasons we not only challenge the accuracy of his statement, but think it safe to hazard the opinion that a single Pullman car would comfortably seat every old Confederate soldier "who would turn swiftly with abhorrence from any suggestion that it would have been better for the South if it had succeeded in establishing an independent government." We claim to be as loyal to the United States today as Secretary Dickinson, and as anxious for the success of the noble efforts of President Taft to make the Southern people feel that they are again, and in fact, "in the house of their fathers." But we can never admit to be classed with George Washington or Robert E. Lee. "The old-time religion is good enough for me."

In February last we had the honor to represent Lee Camp, of this city, on the occasion of the presentation of the portrait of General Lewis A. Armistead, who fell within the Federal works on Gettysburg Heights, the spot being now appropriately designated as "the high-water mark of the Confederacy."

It was distinctly a Confederate gathering, the Daughters, old and young, being largely in evidence, and the spirit moved us to speak thus:

"On a visit to Gettysburg two summers ago I stood upon the spot where Armistead fell, and my reflections upon the catastrophe which there befell the Confederate cause were similar to those of Goldwin Smith as he stood where Harold fell, battling bravely for his country and his throne. Had Lee triumphed at Gettysburg the Confederate States of America would have taken a proud place among the nations of the world: the institutions founded by the wise and good men, who were the fathers of the republic, would have developed in accordance with their original beneficent intent. There would have been no such shock to civilization as has resulted from the ignorant and impertinent interference of the North with the right to solve our own domestic problems and preserve our superior social organization from alien and debasing contamination. Richmond would have been one of the finest capitals in the world; there would have been as many bridges across the James as there are across the Thames, and the great reservoir of the South, which are now largely exploited to make millionaires beyond our borders, would have been utilized for the enrichment and prosperity of our own people. With 'Marse Robert' to restrain and direct these resources surely have been something doing in the country by the boys who wore the gray. While I have faithfully observed the parole I gave at Appomattox, and have gladly welcomed the restoration of cordial relations between the sections, I have never stilled myself so far as to think, and much less to say, that it was best that our righteous cause did not prevail. Nor shall I ever lower my standard so far as to admit that Lincoln is worthy, in any respect, to be classed with George Washington or Robert E. Lee. 'The old-time religion is good enough for me.'"

General E. P. Alexander is one of the few distinguished Confederates of our acquaintance who agrees with Secretary Dickinson, but that his following among his old comrades is small may be judged from the concluding paragraphs of Captain V. Gordon McCabe's admirable review of his "Military Memoirs of a Confederate." Captain McCabe, the gallant adjutant of Peggam's famous fighting battalion, of wide travel and large acquaintance, vir quid vidit homines et nobes, says:

"In his point of view, General Alexander has seen fit to say that, had the Confederate cause succeeded, 'it would now prove a curse, and adds: 'We have good cause to thank God for our escape from it.' He has, of course, a right to his opinion, and he is full of the stuff that bows down in the House of Runyon. 'The fell serpent is strictly in his arrest, and ever thinner grows the thing that gray line. But we make bold to say that there are not a few of his old companions in arms, who, while accepting in good faith the pitiless logic of the heavier righteousness of their contention, and hold that it is not good that a righteous cause should ever perish from the earth; who, recalling the supreme sacrifices, the self-abnegation, the heroic constancy of their people as they stood at bay for four long years, ringed with steel and fire—remembering with a splendid valor of the people faith and their side in battle, whose bright and glorious figures sweep athwart the troubled story wearing their wounds like stars—here are not a few of these surviving veterans who neither share the opinion, nor sympathize with the feeling of thankfulness which causes Dickson, sed victa Cato! One more witness and we close our comments, which, we need not assure our friend Dickinson, have been made in the frankest and friendliest spirit. It is famous Hellenist in all the land, and without a superior in scholarly attainments—our dear old comrade of Gordon's staff—who wrote to us, after our old chief's 'Reminiscences' appeared, in which 'Old Gili' gallantly in battle was mentioned, 'that as Aeschylus was prouder of his share in the battle of Marathon than of any of his great dramas, so he was prouder of Gordon's testimony to his behavior in battle than of any compliment that has ever been paid to his Greek scholarship.' In an article, entitled 'The Creed of the Old South,' which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly in the year 1892, Mr. Childers wrote thus: 'What the cause we fought for and our brothers died for was the cause of civil liberty, and not the cause of human slavery, is a thesis which we feel ourselves bound to maintain whenever our motives are challenged or misunderstood, if only for our children's sake. But even that will not long be necessary, for the vindication of our principles will be made manifest in the working out of the problems with which the republic has to grapple. If, however, the effacement of the lines and the complete centralization of the government shall prove to be the wisdom of the future, the poetry of life will still find its home in the old order, and those who loved their State best will live longest in song and legend—song yet ensuing, legend not yet crystallized.' R. W. H.

Colonel John Wilder Atkinson's Statement as to the First Man Killed in the War of Secession—Wyatt was a Virginian—Honors Divided.

Henry Lawson Wyatt, formerly of Richmond, was the first man killed in battle on the Confederate side during the War Between the States.

There is no doubt about this fact, and no denial, but there is a question as to what State he was a member of. Virginia or North Carolina. Henry Wyatt commenced his military life in a volunteer company of local military, and enlisted in Company A, at that time commanded by Captain Atkinson. He was discharged on his own request, having been offered work as a machinist in North Carolina.

The autumn of 1861 witnessed an unusual excitement in the country. Several of the Southern States had already seceded, and Virginia and North Carolina were looked to anxiously to see whether they would follow and unite with South Carolina and Alabama in withdrawing from the Union of States.

About April, 1861, Lincoln issued his famous order calling on all the States to furnish their quota of the 75,000 men which he proposed to raise to reduce to submission the States which had already seceded. This proclamation of Mr. Lincoln made it necessary for Virginia and North Carolina to determine what they would do, either to join with the States that had already seceded, or furnish a portion of the troops, then being organized, to bring the recalcitrant States into subjection to the Union, or to array themselves in hostility to the other Southern States.

Virginia had already announced her purpose to adhere to the Union, and hoped that there might be some accommodation of the differences in regard to which the country was divided. The convention was then in session in Richmond, and the presence of her members to Washington to accept of a possible, some measure of conciliation with the President, by which the Union, to which she was firmly attached, could be preserved, by the withdrawal of the ordinance of secession wherever it had been adopted.

Mr. Lincoln was firm in his purpose to force submission, as he said, to the government, and the commissioners came back to Richmond and so reported to the Convention. Then, not until then, was the secession movement successful. North Carolina very shortly afterwards adopted a similar ordinance to that of Virginia; that was to stand with the South. War was then apparently inevitable, and troops were raised by both States to meet the issue.

The Peninsula of Virginia was recognized by our military men as the most probable point of attack, and Colonel J. Bankhead Magruder was sent there with several regiments of volunteers, and with the Richmond Howitzers, to resist any approach of the hostile force. North Carolina, too, sent a force of military, consisting in part of the Edgecombe Guards, to defend the threatened entry to the South at that point.

The Howitzers, of Richmond, were commanded by Major George Randolph, afterwards Secretary of War in the Cabinet of President Davis. The forces of Colonel Magruder and Colonel North, which latter commanded the North Carolina force, joined at Bethel Church, which is some ten miles below Yorktown, on June 10, 1861. General B. P. Butler appeared in a part of the United States army in our front and threatened our breastworks.

There was a large frame building immediately in front of our troops, behind which Butler's force concealed themselves, and their sharpshooters therefrom were enabled to fire and annoy our men without risk to themselves. Major Randolph attempted at first to set fire to this frame barn with a hundred yards of wire, but found it difficult to get it on fire, and called for a small detail of men to go to the barn with combustibles and burn it down.

Three men of the Edgecombe Guards, who were guarding the artillery, volunteered for the work, and one of these three was Wyatt, who had recently joined the company of men from Company A, of Richmond, as before stated. These three men promptly passed over our breastworks and ran towards the barn. When about a hundred yards from the barn, and before they were aware that the barn was occupied by any part of the attacking forces, the blinds were thrown open, and the men were seen approaching, were fired on, and Wyatt fell, being shot in the forehead.

After Wyatt was taken charge of by his near relative, who was a member of Company A, enlisted in Richmond, and of which Henry, as already said, was formerly a member. His body was carried in an ambulance back to Yorktown, and there buried.

Though it is true he had been for some months a discharged member of this company, yet his relatives and former friends in the company apparently regarded him as still being one of their comrades at the time of his death. As before stated, all of his family relations were still in Richmond, and his temporary residence in North Carolina was not considered as more than a temporary removal to that State.

As Father Ryan wrote, about the time of his death, he belonged to the Edgecombe Guards, of North Carolina, and was killed at or near Bethel Church, Va., June 10, 1861, in defense of his country."

"We care not whence they came, Ours in their lifeless clay: Whether unknown to fame, Their cause and country still the same, They died and wore the gray."
